

Editorial Note

Dear Readers,

I am delighted to welcome you to the second issue of the Nordic Journal of Legal Studies. Having recently assumed the role of Editor, I am impressed by the quality and range of scholarship presented by our authors.

I would like to sincerely express my gratitude to the Editorial Board for their warm welcome, guidance, and commitment throughout the process. Additionally, I extend my heartfelt appreciation to all the authors for their valuable contributions, dedication, and hard work in shaping this issue.

Our first article delves into the crossroads of law and technology, highlighting potential gaps in the current regulatory framework around FinTech and cryptocurrencies which could be exploited for money laundering. This analysis offers a call to action for legislators to pay more attention to these emerging technologies.

Turning to competition law in the digital age, our second article examines the Google Shopping case on the interpretation of Article 102 TFEU. The author insightfully navigates us through the complex landscape of digital markets and dominant positions, encouraging us to give further thought to this issue.

Next, we journey to the north with a close examination of the Finnish Mining Act in relation to the prohibition of retrogression of Sámi culture. The author's analysis challenges the extent to which the legislation protects the rights of the Sámi people, and thus offers an invitation to reevaluate the current legal protections in place.

Finally, the precision of green claims in marketing is put under the microscope. By examining Finnish and Swedish Consumer Ombudsman rulings from Finland and Sweden, the author encourages greater mindfulness about how environmental benefits are communicated, fostering a more sustainable marketing approach. This exploration is a timely reminder of the role of law in the era of sustainability.

These diverse perspectives represent the breadth and depth of legal studies, and I am sure you will find them all both enlightening and thought-provoking.

Thank you for your continued support for the NJLS. We are grateful for your engagement and look forward to fostering meaningful conversations in the issues to come.
